Vice Admiral (ret.) William F. Raborn Jr. (left) was named last week by President Johnson to succeed John A. McCone as chief of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Richard Helms (right), an agency career man, was named deputy chief. Raborn's nomination, a surprise to almost everyone except John Macy Jr., Johnson's talent scout who recommended him, was almost unanimously praised. A tough, smart administrator, Raborn headed the program that developed the Polaris missile and gave the U.S. a long leg-up on the Russians in submarine warfare. But in addition to weapons he knows how to handle people. "I am not the kind of man," he once said, "who when he puts his pants on in the morning thinks the whole world is dressed."
